The Phantom Buil-BY OFHELIA. In life's spring-time I knew a Bull, Owned by the reverend village pastor, Whose deep-toned roaring filled all full Of horror—even the schoolmaster. Our master was a noble youth, With blood of purest Anglo-Saxon,

Who loved Dame Justice and the truth-And dearly prized was Tutor Jackson. 'Twas noontide one fine Saturday ; The scholars laid away their books, And happy hearts beat high for play, Expressed by smiles and cheerful looks.

"Dismissed! go out in order! march!" The well-drilled urchins leave the school, Each little neck as stiff as starch, And in their ranks no dunce or fool. About the door we laid our plan

For sport and frolic after dinner; And full of glee each student ran, As though the race was to the winner. Hark, hark! the bellowing thunders break, See, see! the monster paws the sand; Which makes the trembling scholars quake, And puts to flight the little band.

Across the lot with wildest speed, Each heart and hoof goes pit-a-pat, "O, help! in this our time of need," The teacher cried, and threw his hat!

On Monsieur's horns it safely lodged,

That hat and plume all proudly waving; And caught his eye till Jackson dodged Behind the creature, madly raving. " Now, boys," he said, seizing his tail, "All you who go for intervention Catch hold of this! and, without fail, We'll skin the brute beyond redemption!" No sooner said than it was done; Each foot is planted in the sod, While our opponent strives to run By expert twist and frantic nod.

With fiery breath and nostrils wide, A moment more he tugs away, Then wildly leaped from out his hide, And piled us up promiscuously.

The frightful scene I viewed that day, My very heart's warm blood congealed; Tutor and boys bewildered lay Beneath the bloody robe concealed.

The smoking bull, with tearful eyes, And oozing blood from every pore, Gazed for an instant in surprise, Then, bounding off, was seen no more. When falls the ebon pall of night,

A spectre glideth through the gloom. Whose eyeballs glare with lurid light, And on its crest a hat and plume. Since then, whoe'er has passed that spot. When evening shades are gathering cool, Whether he's brave and swift, or not,

Is swallowed by the Phantom Bull.

Sir Francis Hend up on the Press.

Sir Francis Head writes to the London Times a letter, and the letter to the Times of Sir Francis endeavors to show that Louis Napoleon is the prince of good fellows, and that a war, if one happens, must be ascribed to the editorials of the London press. He reiterates, Sir Francis does, one of his "faggets," as follows. to wit:

rior, with gentle manners and a benevolent heart; Louis Napoleon is an honest, bold, high-minded statesman, whose object is to maintain the peace of Europe and the real glory and honor of France." And while he admits the rule of this pure patriot and will only earn the proverbial fate of fools who interpose in connubial quarrels.

Poor old Sir Francis Head! This all comes from the well-spent compliments the Prince paid him at Paris. They have turned his head -contorted his eyesight. A short time ago he was the veriest alarmist in England. His letters to the Times rent half the national night-caps; aggravated the national spleen; peopled the Thames with suicides; set all the grannies agog with the apparition of old "Boney" revived, and coming once more, as he tried to come before, to murder and plunder, burn and violate. Sir Francis proved the kingdom to be without means of resistance; showed that the French had only to sail over in pleasure-boats from Cherbourg to Cowes, and have everything their own way. And all this did Sir Francis Head less than a year ago; and here he is scolding at the press for listening at last to his absurdities. He is doing his individual utmost to impose the same restrictions upon speech in England that exist in France; and the penalty of refusal is to be war. Can it be that the few pats which the Prince bestowed upon the head of the knight, or rather the Knight of the Head, have made him so thorough a devotee? The press of Belgium is silenced by terror; is the same agent expected to control the English ? So says Sir Francis; but so, in spite of his fancies, and faggots, and fears, it is hardly likely to be .- New York Times.

An incident recently occurred in a town on the Conneticut River, which illustrates the danger of practical joking, and served, at the time, its purposes of fun and raillery. A certain barber happening at a store, a clerk, who wished to play the barber a trick, offered him a bott e of bear's oil. The latter did not want it. himself in a buggy, and set off for his host's country but being over-urged, took it, and paid for it. On his opening it, in his shop, the oil was found to be lamp oil, with a very rank smell.
